

Organization | Improver

You are continually wondering how you can make things better. Often your answer lies in restructuring resources. How can you rearrange your schedule to get more done? How can you put your resources to better use? How could your products or services help your customers become more efficient or help them more easily reach their goals? These questions come naturally to you. You have an inherent sense of tactical organization. You see how the various pieces fit together and almost automatically can spot opportunities for improvement.

This organizational flair can be a real benefit in maximizing your efforts. By taking the time to plan ahead, you will find you can significantly improve outcomes. This talent can also help you with your customers. Often bringing in a new product or a service can require that a customer make other adjustments. Your innate strength in this area can help simplify this process and improve their organization as a result.

Collaboration Alert: Realize that sometimes the cost in time or money to rearrange resources can outweigh the benefits. Question if you are making real improvements or if you are simply rearranging deck chairs on the Titanic. For best results be sure to inject a good dose of practicality into your thinking. Don't get discouraged if your colleagues or clients do not agree with all of your suggestions.

“You are continually wondering how you can make things better.”

The Science of Performance